A Note from the Creator

I am an industrial designer, not a marketer. I created this product to fill a clear gap in the market: there was no meaningful piece that truly honors the pot still—the very soul of whisky.

After visiting a distillery, guests carry with them vivid memories: the glow of copper stills, the rich aroma of the spirit house, and the stories from the master distiller. Yet all too often, they take home only a decorative trinket—one with no function, no narrative, and no real link to their experience.

My goal was to design a piece that lets customers revisit their distillery visit through scent and taste, not just sight. Its iconic pot-still shape is instantly recognizable, while cold diffusion technology preserves your spirit's true character without heat damage. More than a souvenir, it is a functional keepsake that brings your brand, your craft, and your distillery's story into their daily lives.

Form Follows Meaning

The pot still is not just a vessel—it's the soul of whisky. Its distinctive shape is instantly recognizable to anyone who loves spirits. But after a distillery visit, guests leave with nothing but memories.

This diffuser bridges that gap. It's a functional sculpture that brings the distillery experience home. Every time your customer uses it, they're reminded of your craft, your story, your brand.

The design is intentionally simple. No unnecessary ornamentation.

Just the pure, iconic form of the pot still—rendered in laboratory-grade borosilicate glass and solid oak.

"The vessel that shaped your whisky's soul should live on in your customer's memory."

The Choice Is Clear

✘ Old Way

Generic gift shop items with no connection to the distillery

T-shirts that shrink. Pens that run out. Notebooks that stay blank. Coasters that get lost. These items have no connection to the copper stills, the oak casks, or the stories you shared during the tour. They're forgotten the moment your guests leave.

The problem:

- No functional value beyond decoration
- No connection to the distillery experience
- Easily forgotten or discarded
- Doesn't reinforce your brand story

✔ New Way

Functional keepsake that tells your story

Your guests take home a miniature pot still that actually works. Every time they use it—whether for whisky nosing or essential oils—they're transported back to your distillery. It sits on their desk, their bar cart, their nightstand. It's a daily reminder of your craft.

The advantage:

- Functional product used daily
- Instant visual connection to your distillery
- Keeps your brand alive in their home
- Tells your story through form and function
